Subject: AT&T 5G Transmitters

This seems to be a really serious decision to rush into without a little more background research to verify the effects on humans and animals. I understand there is a financial incentive and a nudge from the FCC, who is supposed to consider safety, but government agencies don't always consider consequences to the public in their quest to accomplish "improvements."

This may be a wonderful idea, but a little time and research on safety issues and conversations with other communities who have had experience with this technology does not seem unreasonable to me. These transmitters will be placed in family neighborhoods and we owe our citizens the consideration of making sure they are not harmful over time.
